I think the quality of an architect differs with how well he or she defines the quest”

he is driven to constantly reinvent his work. His central concerns involve a simultaneous engagement in practice and research.

The prospect of instead creating communities where the plans could actually make someone's daily life better really excites Rahul Kadri, Principal Architect & Director, Kadri Consultants. Kadri believes in the idea of looking at people first, and to the power of physical design to change the social life of a community. Rahul Kadri spent his formative years amidst lush landscapes exploring the forests of the Kumaon Himalayas while studying at Sherwood College, Nainital. This early relationship with nature infused within him with a deep passion to create buildings & spaces, which are in harmony with its natural context.

Kadri believes that the architecture should be functional and prudent. He also tries to create a design which makes the society to do better. "I think the quality of an architect differs with how well he or she defines the quest. So what's the quest? What's the function? Are we trying to make children more intelligent? Can a building do that? I believe it can. So, can I design for intelligence? Can I design for friendship? (Referring to a school design) People perform better when buildings perform better," he says. ■
